Information for Parents

https://www.huffpost.com/entry/advice-from-teachers-to-p_b_3819530

In October 2013, HuffPost released an article entitled Advice From Teachers to Parents. Here are a few tips from the article.

- Teach your children to be prepared; it's not just for the Boy Scouts.

- Education that stops when the school day ends is an incomplete education. Kids who do not continue their school work and learning outside of school -- including reading, reviewing the days work and talking with their parents about what they learned that day, leads to a lack of retention by the students and an under-appreciation for what was taught to them that given day.

- On that note, the earlier this reinforcement of a student's education becomes part of a student's life, there is a greater degree to which students will get used to talking about what they learned, engage in conversation and later, debate. This firmly entrenches what they learned -- math, english, science, social studies and the arts -- into their brains for longer learning retention.

- Think of a child's day in this manner: a 24 hour day can be broken down like this -- eight hours of school, including commute to and from, eight hours at home and eight hours of sleep, give or take an hour here and there. The eight hours at school and the eight hours at home need to be chock full of learning so that while sleeping, the thoughts are processed and organized and problems solved, making the students stronger learned in the long run.
